At the end of 2020, I was struck by two cases of doctors who expressed themselves and faced the consequences. Since both of them took it considerably from the surprise I thought that writing through it helped me to organize and elaborate my thoughts. The first case I wanted to reconsider was the release of a transphobic statement by one of the guests of the podcast Accad and Koka Report, which eventually cost him his Twitter account. When I first met this podcast I thought I had found a smart window and well studied on the prospects for medicine I had never considered before. Nothing in my previous experience has raised doubts about the motivations of NRMPs to develop the current test paradigm or the real justification of this frequent maintenance of certification tests. The hosts themselves seemed the same kind of refined and educated professionals I interacted with daily during clinical work. Since my family and I are more left, I saw the podcast as a means to get a wider understanding of the profession I would soon have undertaken. Outside of medicine, I found myself fascinated by the creative reflections on the merits of school lotteries simply because it was the first time I saw children of immigrants prone to the academy. Given my background in medical history, I have been thinking a lot about how and if we can justify the results obtained by historical doctors in the context of their general life and their socio-political actions. However, I would never have expected to apply it to someone whose work I had learned to respect, if not to share, at the present time. Making everything even more difficult to grow with a stock exchange director as a parent, being active in the admission process of my school, applying for residence myself, and above all having close respect and friendships that embrace the spectrum of sexual identity, in my eyes there is no justification for his feelings. Although the claim itself goes beyond my understanding, the seeds, which in this case are sprouted in a singular and tragically robust way, are not. Having seen the frustration of my most conservative friends and a professor to whom I am very tied because of the pervasive and alleged inclination to the left of those who attend the school of medicine, I can see how, in the case of a person who feels particularly alienated from the system, can imprison for decades in glazingWide range. The other incident, which shocked me enough as a future doctor to finally get my finger on the keyboard, was the firing of Dr. James Phillips from Walter Reed. While the details are still coming out at the time of the Write I never anticipated that a doctor protected by early amendment rights will find himself suddenly taken off the travel program simply to issue a statement in line with his training and knowledge. In my limited practice up to this point, I had to deal with patients with VIPs, some of whom were far from happy with the messages I relayed from a team. What gave me the confidence as a medical student to deal with these influential individuals was an infallible belief that as long as I spoke the truth and had the support of my colleagues I was safe from any serious reprisal. Dr. Phillipsâ€ Case forces me to question whether there is such a security. In relation to this it is a natural concern for a worsening of the already documented paradigm of VIP treatment of the patient leading to a lower quality of care. Now that deference to the state can also be tinged with fear of retaliation, I certainly don't see any reason why the care of elite patients would improve. When I entered medicine for the first time, I naively believed that it was a realm where the governed data was admired and opened the speech. As I progressed in my formation, and particularly endured the year 2020, I was disillusioned with this perception. Doctors interact more in public through the expansion of social media and social pressures pervade more emptied in all aspects of life as a result of increased polarization. Medicine is reaping the negative effects, either in the form of forced silence of minority opinions until something genuinely unacceptable manifests in the mind, and subsequently in public view, or with an increase in the climate of fear for those health providers simply by speaking their minds in the light of their experience. Read more from Adil. By Ken Michaels, guest writer in the game of Shakepeare - â€Ahamlet, â€"Churches of the Prince's Poland, â€" What are you reading, my â€sir? He is not at all satisfied with what is Reading, Hamlet replies, â€" Words, words, words. - Earlier I described the communication model in which a sender encodes a message and then sends it through a channel (or medium) to a receiver, which decodes the message and ideally understands what has been sent. Surely the most common way to encode a message is to choose the most appropriate words for the listener or reader. In the case of Hamlet, he did not like so much what he read that he described him as elementary, as mere words, rather than a message. So I thought I'd dedicate some ink to the words themselves. Words have specific meaningful words that end in nym describe classes of words. Some of the most frequently used words nym are synonymous (means the di); antonym (means the opposite of); homonym (has the same sound as); and acronym (a word derived from the first letters of a more complex term, such as scuba or AIDS). Homo means â€â€ same, â€â€ and hetero means â€â€ â€â€ Different.â€â€ "So, if there are homonyms, it is going to reason that there are also heteronyms. While homonyms have the same sound but different spellings couple and pear), the heterons are written the same but have different meanings and often pronounce: a person sewing is a sewer, but a repository for waste products is a sewer. Sewer, then, is a heteronym. But the lexicon of nymphs doesn't end there. One of the sites I visited recently2 lists as many as 26 words, many of which are rather arcane and of interest to relatively few. Some of them are really funny. Do we really need a word to say another word made up of two identical parts? If so, then tutu, pawpaw, yo-yo, and bye-bye are tautonyms. A couple of weeks ago, my son asked me what a metonym meant. I didn't know, so we looked up. In retrospect, I should have been able to log out, as â€metâ€ means change. A metonym is a word that designates something from a word that is associated with it. For example, Hollywood is a metonym used to indicate the U.S. film industry, while the Crown refers to royalty, and the bottle refers to alcohol. My use of the expression "a bit of ink" a couple of paragraphs back is also a metonym for written communication, even when it is not involved real ink or writing on paper. The point of all this has to do with precision in the use of our language. It won't do me good to encode a message using a word like metonym, or heteronym, or lautonym, unless I'm sure my listeners (or readers) know what it means. Either that, or I'm willing to add the definition for their benefit, in which case I may have just used the definition in the first place. However, learning the proper use of words, however arcane, can be helpful, and if you like the words themselves, even fun. What's your idiot? In his book "The Half Life of Facts: Why Everything We Know Has an Expiry Date", Samuel Arbesman3 discusses the changes in language that occur over time, and the two camps that see this phenomenon differently. He explains prescriptive grammars as those who focus on how words should be used, and descriptive grammars as those who are most interested in how they are actually used. Arbesman says that each individual develops his own set of rules on how to use words, and that all of us, you, me and everyone else, have our own personal idiot. This delightful term describes our unique language and pattern of speech, as determined by what we learned when we were young, as well as by those around us, and includes our grammar, vocabulary, pronunciation of words, and even our accent. There's an important lesson here. If we really want to communicate effectively, we need to be aware that every time we enter a message, someone will be able to communicate with us. idiolet is significantly different from our can most likely decode it so that you get a completely different message. So you pay to be careful about our choice of words; is it really a message, or simply "words, words, words"? © 2013 Ken Michaels. All rights reserved.
